The ACL is the primary load-bearing ligament of the knee. It is often the case that more damage occurs to the ACL than to any other portion of the knee joint. In order to restore the ACL to its normal function, doctors insert a graft or artificial ligament made of synthetic or semisynthetic materials into the knee and suture the graft(s) to the ends of the ACL such that the grafts become attached to the femur and tibia bone ends. It is important to properly secure the graft to the bone during reconstruction of the ACL. This is particularly true when connecting the graft to bone structures that are not parallel, e.g. the tibia and femur. When a graft is attached to a tibia and femur that are not in a parallel position, the graft sutures, called bone plugs, are placed along the anterior and posterior sides of the knee joint, and are attached to the two bone ends. During insertion of the graft into the joint, the graft can be twisted, e.g. skewed, such that the bone plugs are misaligned with the bone plugs connected to the tibia. Misalignment can result in reduced healing and integrity of the graft-tissue interface. Prior art techniques for placement of bone plugs are shown in FIGS. 1A, 1B, 2A, and 2B, which are described further herein.This invention relates to electrical outlets, and more particularly to a decorative receptacle socket cover assembly and method. Decorative socket covers for standard receptacles have been the focus of several attempts at providing an aesthetically pleasing receptacle cover. These covers, while providing good aesthetics, may be overly complicated and may require a particular mounting structure
