Abstract

In Indonesia holders of indigenous knowledge about natural disasters are often musicians and storytellers, who perform the information, as both historical fact and personal reflections on recent events (Fraser 2010, Kartomi 2012). Music is a very powerful way of ensuring that indigenous knowledge about disasters is transferred across generations and in this paper I look at how influential performers reference moveable messages across multiple performance genres, beloved by local populations. Through performance, important environmental and humanitarian reflection remains circulating for a long time in the oral memory of a community and in my paper I will explore examples from Sumatra including the eruption of Krakatau in 1883, the Tsunami on Simeulue Island, Aceh in 1907 and 2004, and the earthquake and flash floods in West Sumatra in 2009 and 2011.

In an academic world encouraging inter-disciplinary research can ethnomusicologists, and popular culture scholars usefully contribute to knowledge about disaster risk reduction, through music? In 1994 the UN Yokohama Strategy expressed the value of indigenous knowledge for natural disaster prevention, preparedness and mitigation, as did the Hyogo Framework for Action 2005-2015. It is difficult, however, to intersect indigenous knowledge with scientific processes such as risk modeling, multi-hazard risk assessment and hazard mapping. In this paper I will also look at the collaborative practicalities of inter-disciplinary research on music and disasters. For scientists, successful engagement with indigenous knowledge, such as messages contained in sung narratives and pop songs, requires an epistemological shift, towards an acceptance of other ways of knowing. As Indonesia emerges from over a decade of socio-political reformasi how can local intersections of music and disaster inform current global debates on environmental and cultural resilience in Asia?
