[ARTICLE END] A...A...American Psycho sequel? Not so fast, my friend... But if... if this is not a remake of William Lustig's 1998 American remake- yikes! This would be an oddity indeed, but I was surprised by the originality of The House Next Door. The plot is basically the plot of Poltergeist, right down to the dream sequence and the frequent moving of furniture... But The House Next Door still managed to be very effectively creepy and well-acted, and it has a nice ending that I think (for once) stays true to the spirit of '80s horror. Excellent film! Let's not let this become another remake! An unusually ambitious entry in the haunted house horror genre by writer-director Demetrius Navarro for his first feature film. The story centers around a family moving into their dream suburban home next door to an abandoned house full of distractions. Navarro lives next door to the real-life location of his story. It's not a matter of what the family doesn't know that eventually drives them crazy, but rather it is their gradual realization that they are locked in a battle with an unseen killer who has special designs on the patriarch. Keeping the threat off screen for much of the movie does keep us in suspense, but also tends to keep this movie from being truly scary. However, one does get an eerie sense of dread with each scene in which what will happen next is not obvious. It's a horror film I don't mind watching again.
